Edward St Aubyn's Lost for Words is a weak satire on literary prizes, in particular the Booker Prize and the 2011 judging panel. Headed by former M15 head turned novelist Stella Rimington, the 2011 panel chose to focus on accessible books for the public to enjoy - because, y'know, reading can be enjoyable - rather than pretentiously written books, which usually take home the prize.

"St Aubyn's powers of observation are as sharp as ever." —Henry Hitchings, Financial Times "Lost for Words is a fizzing satire that neatly skewers all the contradictions of literary prize-giving... Lost for Words is very funny, but it also makes some serious points about what is good writing, who is best qualified to make judgments about it... [The Melrose novels] are the most extraordinary transmutation of personal horror into great art."
