'Saffron Skies' is an embodiment of the phrase 'Never judge a book by its cover'. The cover of this book doesn't tell you anything about the story inside. I wish I meant this in a way that implies the story is incredibly meaningful and unexpected, but unfortunately I mean it literally conveys nothing about the story correctly. Not the title, not the tagline. Not even the bloody blurb.

Saffron Skies by Lesley Lokko - Goodreads

Leslie Lokko is an incredible writer, probably up there in my top top two. Her insight into relationships is beautifully and tangibly written, whilst displaying a sensitive knowledge of actual political events that leave the reader spellbound until the end.

Saffron Skies, like Sundowners, is partly set in Africa. This time, it is the beautiful country of Mali, where journalist Amber Sall meets Tendé Ndiaye, an up-and-coming young politician. Vast, landlocked, full of culture and history, Mali is perhaps best known to Western readers for the fabled city of Timbuctoo. When Amber's father, the wealthy industrialist Max Sall, asks her to visit ...
